AWAY AT CAMP

JIMMY looked around the bus station. It all looked so big, and he felt so small.

"Now write to us," his mother warned for the 97th time.

"And be a good boy," his father told him again.

"O.K.," Jimmy answered, still looking around at the other boys saying good-bye to their parents. Finally the man shouted over the big loudspeaker, "All 'board for the bus to Camp Pow-an-tee."

Out of the corner of his eyes he saw the camp counselor, a big tanned man gathering all the boys toward the bus. His mother hugged him and his father patted him on the shoulder.

"See you in two weeks, son," he said, and before Jimmy knew it, he had gotten on the bus and was on his way out of the city.

There was another fellow sitting right alongside him, and before they had gone very far, the fellow spoke up.

"I'm Danny McCullough . . . who are you?"

"Jimmy Talbot," Jimmy said quietly. He couldn't help feeling lonesome already as the bus counted off the miles between him and his mother and father at home. It was the first time he had been away from them, and he didn't want to admit it, but everything looked very strange.

"Been to Camp Pow-an-tee before?" Danny asked.

"N-no," Jimmy answered.

"Oh, you'll like it," Danny told him. "Why, the first night you're there, you go on a big snark hunt."

"Snark hunt?" Jimmy asked. "What's a snark hunt?"

"It's a little animal . . . an' it's got green fur and blue eyes," Danny said. "An' it's awful fast. Everybody's got to get a snark before they leave camp."

"They do? I didn't see anything about it on the folders from camp."

"Oh . . . well, they probably forgot to put it in."

They talked about other things that were going to happen in camp, but Jimmy couldn't get the idea of snark hunting out of his mind. And even when he got out of the bus and got his assigned to him, he was still thinking about it.

Danny McCullough shared his cabin, and so did two other boys. They'd been to camp before too, and they quickly nodded their heads "yes" when Jimmy asked them about the snark hunt.

"Oh sure . . . we've all hunted snarks," they told him.

"Didja catch any," Jimmy asked them.

"Sure . . . but you'd better not tell anybody you're going," one of the fellows said.

"Why?" Jimmy asked, suddenly suspicious.

"Well, just 'cause they'd all want to come. And you really have to be alone to hunt snarks, because too many people make too much noise."

"Oh," Jimmy said.

The fellows all arranged for Jimmy's snark hunting. It was to be just between dinner and lights out.

"Nobody'll miss you then, because we're all supposed to be in our cabins writing letters or reading," Danny told him.

So just after dinner, armed with a flashlight and a slingshot, Jimmy started out into the woods around camp, looking to the right and left for something which might be a snark. Once he thought he'd found one, but it turned out to be a woodchuck.

He wandered deeper and deeper into the woods, but he wasn't afraid of getting lost because he made sure he marked his trail very well. Every time he'd walk by a bush or tree, he'd look behind it hoping to find a snark.

Finally he looked at his watch and found that he only had 20 minutes to get back to camp before lights out.

"Oh, gee," he thought. "If I don't catch a snark tonight, I'll probably have to keep going out every night till I catch one," he turned around and trudged wearily back toward camp.

But carefully as he had marked the trees along the trail, Jimmy found them very hard to see in the gathering darkness. It took him much longer than it should have to get within a mile of camp. He heard the bugle notes of "taps" being played and started to run so he wouldn't be counted late his very first night in camp.

He was a little out of breath when he got to the camp clearing, and he stumbled right into the arms of the camp counselor, Mr. Dinning.

"You're Jimmy Talbot, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," Jimmy answered obediently. "I'm sorry I'm late," he added.

Both of them looked down at Jimmy's flashlight and slingshot.

"What have you been doing

Is the house gonna blow up, Ma? Because I wanna invite my friend Hortense to see the fun!
Be quiet and get back to your cooking!
Let me see you put the bread in the toaster!

Sure, Ma...
Thank Heaven! Show your father what it is!
O.K.
I learned to take good care of the can opener... because you can't cook without it!
An hour later...
I wasted so much time with Zelda in the kitchen, that I didn't have time to cook your dinner!
So I've gotta take you OUT to eat!

out in the woods," Mr. Dinning asked.

"Well . . . I was just hunting, sir," Jimmy told him, embarrassed.

"It's against the rules to hunt around Camp Pow-an-tee," Mr. Dinning frowned. "What were you hunting?"

"Snark, sir!"

"SNARK!" Mr. Dinning shouted.

"I didn't catch any . . ." Jimmy added quickly. "In fact I didn't even see any. I didn't know it was against the rules . . . honest."

To Jimmy's surprise, Mr. Dinning wasn't cross with him. Instead, he started to laugh. He laughed and rubbed Jimmy's hair with his hand. Then he said, "Come on over here and sit down on this rock, Jimmy. You and I have something to talk over."

Mr. Dinning talked a long time to Jimmy. He told him there wasn't really any such thing as a snark . . . it was just a made-up name that the rest of the kids dreamed up to play a joke on Jimmy. Mr. Dinning said they do that to almost all the new boys. That they didn't really mean any harm, it was just a joke.

"I'm not mad, Mr. Dinning . . . honest. I just don't know what to tell them when I get back to the cabin.

"Well, I think maybe I can help you on that," Mr. Dinning told him.

And a few minutes later, Jimmy walked into the darkened cabin and all the fellows sat up on their bunks to ask him how he made out. It seemed that Jimmy could see their smiles even in the dark. Well, he did some smiling himself.

"It took me a long time, but I finally got one," he said.

"What!" Danny exclaimed.

"Sure . . . I could tell it was a snark because of its green fur and blue eyes . . . just like you said," Jimmy said seriously.

"Where is it?" they all asked at once.

"Well, I was a little late getting back to camp and I met Mr. Dinning. I showed it to him, and he told me it was a genuine, honest-to-goodness snark all right."

"He did?"

"Sure . . . but he said that it wasn't nice to take animals away from their homes, so we turned it loose in the woods again."

"Aw . . . you're just fooling," one of the fellows sneered.

"No, I'm not," Jimmy's eyes were twinkling. "And if you don't believe me, you can just ask Mr. Dinning. He'll back me up."

That seemed to quiet everybody down, and the fellows all went to sleep. Everybody but Jimmy had a very confused look on their faces.

The next afternoon, Danny approached Jimmy with a shiny piece of metal with a ribbon hanging from it. Danny pinned it on Jimmy's T-shirt, and there it was for everybody to see. The medal said . . . "Champion Snark Hunter of Camp Pow-an-tee . . . 1955."
